Q: Is it normal to be gaining some weight when trying to get rid of it? I have been trying to lose some weight for about a year now and haven't really been successful. I was wondering if what I was doing was normal and if it was normal if I was on a diet or if I was doing it right. I was on a 800 calorie diet for a while but once I stopped I was consuming about 2000 calories a day. Sometimes I felt as if I was getting fatter and I was a little discouraged but then I would start over again and within 10 days the weight had just gone away. Does anyone else experience this or am I doing something wrong? A: As an avid triathlete, my answer to this question is to eat less, to get your heart rate up, to exercise more. It is normal to gain a bit of weight during your dieting and "vacation", especially if you were doing strength training and cross-training as well. During the very beginning of my dieting experience, I did the Atkins diet. When I had lost 10 pounds, I decided that I was done dieting and that I was going to eat like a normal human. I was tempted and very slow to say the least. My appetite was all out of whack. I would eat and eat, but not really eat anything. Once I started to lose that ten pounds again, I then went back to a strict dieting/exercise schedule and lost a bit more weight. My point is this: Eating less and exercise more is the best way to shed the pounds you want to lose. A few additional things to add to this: try not to get hung up on the calories. For example, when I started working out, I felt like I was starving. It's easy to get caught up on the calories, 82157476af
